MR. MONTAGUE'S FINE SPEECH.

Mr. Montague, who was enthustastically received, said he brought no set speech or fixed phrase. It seemed to him this was a day and this a place properly for the holler emotions and memories.

Nor should we concern ourselves, said he so much with the political ideas confected with this place as the personal characters which here wrought out for is our beginning. That this governmental ideal sociological genesis was great, he knew, for here the steel axe of the argle-Saxon met the rock axe of the red man, and the steel had demonstrated its predominant power, and had opened the furrow wherein was planted and whereupon has grown our mighty civilization; that the intervening period of 292 years was the most affluent period of the world's history. But, he thought, this day should be devoted to a memorial excepted in behalf of our great founders; that we should take our stand upon tape Henry and watch the three little holes that now and then appeared above the heakers on that stormy April day in her, that we should thank a kind Providence for the storm which drove the susan Constant, the Godspeed, and the plant Discovery within our shores, and which shally brought them to this place. Here we see them land. Here Raleigh's great old sea-dog, Christopher Newport, placed his courageous feet, and Gosnold, the fiery Rateliff, the masterful Smith, and the hem of 105 souls landed; and the rear with them the first permanent abode of the Anglo-Saxon race in this hemisphere, and the first undertaking of the white man's burden."
